I am not going to post the entire code here, it's just a few lines of code that are specifically relating to this question. The code I posted in my previous question is the entire entry point. To reproduce the problem simply run the following code in DOSBOX with a mouse shortcut key pressed and then wait 20-30 seconds. Then try and press the key again. It will not work until the first time you press the key (in my case the shift key). Once that happens the menu will open as normal and everything works. So after the first time you press the shift key, the menu will start up and you will be able to navigate the menu without any issues. So the problem is that for some reason there are two button events that are occurring instead of one: once when the shift key is pressed for the first time and then again when the key is pressed for the second time. (I figured this out through the debug messages written to the console.) The problem is solved in the screen shot below where there is only the one button pressed (the menu stays open until the "skip" menu choice is made) but it was not clear to me how to approach this problem. I tried searching for similar questions and tried selecting the solution that seemed most promising but it was not working. What I thought was that I had set my initial BUTTON_PRESSED variable to the same value as the shift key and as a result pressing the shift key would not cause an event to occur which would prevent the two key presses from occurring. Maybe I am incorrect about this? A: My guess is that you are using that code in a multi-threaded environment. For example, if it is running in a threaded environment and gets a KEY_DOWN event, it may be that the event handler is executed in a second thread. If so, by the time the event handler gets around to executing, the event has already occurred. You can help to fix that by wrapping your code in a mutex, or you can use key state for this. The easiest way to check for this is to put a breakpoint in your code, then have your program execute a key press, and then click a mouse button or press enter. Then, in your debugger, go to the Keyboard option, and press "Show all" at the bottom left corner of the window. When you do that, each shortcut key that has been pressed will be listed. Looking at your code
