cytochrome b cause dominant transmission of resistance to pyrethroid insecticides in the malaria vector, Anopheles gambiae s.s. Overexpression of pyrethroid detoxification enzymes confers insecticide resistance, but the sequence variations responsible for these changes are unknown. In the current study, we demonstrate that an alternative gene, cytochrome b, confers dominant resistance to pyrethroid insecticides in mosquitoes. In our laboratory population, there are two alleles of cytochrome b (a short gene (cbb^*) and a longer ($cbb+$) gene). Cytochrome b and a are linked in a 1:1 ratio.

Transformation experiments showed that the short cbb^* gene is susceptible to pyrethroid toxicity and that each $cbb+$ allele is able to confer dominant resistance to pyrethroids. The resistance was not due to enhanced metabolism of insecticides. The resistance is regulated at the level of target site.2018 Chevy Silverado 1500
