Saturday, July 28, 2012 Besides having a house and a job, I have a huge interest in science, technology, and history. These interests have combined to result in my blog. I find it fun to get the latest news on what has happened in the world of science, and what is happening now is of particular interest. I cover different areas of science and technology and post them here in a chronological order. I occasionally get letters or e-mails from readers and am often happy to answer questions in a public forum.

Saturday, July 7, 2012 One of the typical questions that am asked is, "How long will it take to grow a chain reaction?" The answer depends on what the person means by a "chain reaction" and what is meant by "the time it takes to grow a chain reaction." Note: do not try to build a water heater or other device with a device that could explode or do damage to people or property. I have used some information from the following link in this post. The fastest time to build a chain reaction I have found is 48 hours! If a person finds a way to do it in 48 hours, it may be the best time to answer the question, but do not assume that the person is serious. All "experiments" done using materials and procedures similar to those found in my tests were done in an environment that is in a good laboratory and is under continuous surveillance by the scientists who monitor such experiments, and the work is reviewed by the scientists who arrange for safety checks after the experiment. Experiments have to be reviewed. The results of the experiments have to be reviewed. My experiments using materials such as those found in "The man who was" have been conducted in a well-designed facility, and have been reviewed by scientists who have known what the experiment is all about and who are experienced in conducting such experiments safely. The materials have also been carefully chosen and prepared to be sure that there will be absolutely no danger to the public, to animals, or to people with allergies who have been tested as part of my work. Other experiments I have conducted have had a simpler set-up, and the results have been reviewed by fewer scientists and have taken a longer time to complete. The facilities, materials, and procedures I have used in these experiments have

Let's read your post, since I tried your method and it works, then you can. Basically you need to configure it as a producer instead of a consumer. To do this you have to change the output device from the Input devices tab, to the Input/Output devices tab. Then you will be able to output the sound from any of the outputs, by navigating through the tabs.
