Looking at 14 different types of customizable desk, the report identifies the range of application possibilities. These range from productivity desks for students, to leisure tasks for teachers to make use of the free time available in a school setting. One of the most impressive aspects of personalized learning, with desks, is the flexibility that it offers. Those who want to engage with work or play can utilize the desk in different ways during the day, or have it as an educational tool for quiet study.

Despite the varied activities available, the report makes the point that a desk is not necessary to get the most out of a customized learning desk. In fact, the report makes the point that a desk is a core, and even necessary, component of customization – whether for productive or creative tasks. Once again, this emphasis on flexibility is a significant finding for the field of education as a whole. Another significant point of the report is the potential to engage students with customized desks through an educational element. A standard desk is only relevant to students who are sitting at the desk. However, with customizable desks, teachers can design and deliver activities to a variety of groups or individuals, including those with special needs, or even engaging with external partners. The ability to customize desks is set to continue the way that learning desk installations are used. Over the past 10 years, we have seen a rise in the number of customized desks set up in the classroom. The report acknowledges this as evidence that the use of desks in learning environments has grown. The report stresses that customized learning desks are a viable and effective addition to any classroom. They have the potential to enhance the learning opportunities for students.
