Temporal variability in environmental nitrate exposures for drinking water, food, and gut microbial processes during early human development. Nitrate exposure of human populations is ubiquitous, and has been associated with adverse health outcomes. However, exposure patterns and bioaccumulation in early human development remain poorly understood. We present the first estimates of the relationship between water, food, and gut microbe exposures to nitrate during gestation and early postnatal development, from approximately 20 weeks gestation to 2 years postnatally. Milk, formula, and water data, collected from 22 human pregnancy and lactation studies, and fecal content data, collected from 24 nonpregnant adults, were analyzed. Average infant gut microbe exposures for lactobacilli, bifidobacteria, and enterobacteria are 0.14, 0.04, and 4.4 mg/L, respectively. Water and food nitrate exposures range from 0.2 to more than 25 mg/L and 0.03 to more than 20 mg/L, respectively, across all gestational periods. The greatest differences in nitrate exposures are observed between the very first weeks of gestation and after 6 months, and during the first year of life, and across maternal versus bottle feeding. For water, food, and gut microbe
