Q: What is the best way to get AGGREGATE and COUNT columns in SQL queries? I have been doing some work to query the Influx data and have noticed that there are a number of useful statistics that I want to produce with every query. Initially I wrote a php script that created the query with the required fields and then manually generated the database. Now I have decided to drop that script and write a couple of API's that will make the process quicker and cleaner. Using Influx.net as my API library, I have a number of helper methods that generate the query that will be run against the database, but I'm stuck at how to work out the aggregate fields and how to produce the right count function. The structure of the database is extremely simple. Every row contains a `_time` field and a tag array. So for example: { `"_time": 1511219800, "tag": { "tag1": 5, "tag2": 7 } }` } I am producing a query that will get the most recent 100 occurrences of tag1 and tag2 across all my time series. Something like this: `SELECT AVG(tag1), COUNT(tag2) FROM my_database WHERE tag1 > 5 and tag2 > 5 GROUP BY tag1, tag2 LIMIT 100`

The question is what would be the best way to produce the 'count' statistics in the same query. Ideally I would like to have the query produce a result like this: A: I don't quite follow the question, as there is no difference between the statements `AVG(tag1)` and `COUNT(tag2)`. The query is: `SELECT AVG(tag1), COUNT(tag2) FROM my_database WHERE tag1`

Sponges of the genus Luffa (Aechmeae) are the largest of their family and are domesticated worldwide, but the species and wild cultivation modes have not been studied. Our objectives were to: 1) characterize L. cylindrica tissue and its raw material markets; 2) obtain genetic evidence of domestication of wild relatives; 3) determine if the two main cultivars are morphologically distinct; 4) resolve the relationship among cultigens and wild relatives; 5) determine the performance of cultures in large scale trials. Tissue of wild and domesticated Luffa from across the Gulf of Mexico and Australia was characterized using MRI and AFLP. Wild material was genetically characterized by cross-amplification in exon 3 of the fatty acid desaturase gene and 13 microsatellite loci. Cultigens were distinguished from wild relatives by significant differences in average length and diameters between domesticated and wild tissues. Cultigens and wild relatives were significantly different from each other in length, diameter, and length-to-diameter ratio. Cultigens of L. cylindrica had mean length of 698 mm and mean diameter of 380 µm, which are significantly smaller than domesticated varieties with mean length of 832 mm and mean diameter of 586 µm. Cultigens exhibited higher amino acid levels than domesticated varieties. Cultigens grew significantly faster than domesticated varieties and as large as 14 months of age. Cultivation improved seed germination for an insect-transmissible fungus, A. ochraceus, which is normally non-infective on L. cylindrica. L. cylindrica tissue markets were evaluated based on sales at eight grocery stores in Houston and one fair
