Inspired by the science fiction movie of the same name, the general gaming concept of the game is to control a series of hackers on a journey through the nameless city of Los Angeles. Each stage is broken down into several missions, which are represented by sub-levels. Each sub-level is a series of levels with the objective of collecting all the Hack Evolutions hacking tools, and defeat the boss hacker in each level, so you can advance to the next sub-level. Hacking tools are a necessary item to have access to areas which lead to a specific part of the city of Los Angeles. You can also access other areas on the city map by completing the objectives of certain missions, and you can also explore the city yourself in the free mode. There are several hack evolutions, each with its own hacking tools. These hacking tools are used to hack the different things, and to activate the teleport room at the beginning of the sub-levels. The game lets you use a variety of weapons to help you in your hacking journey. Each weapon has its own special ability that adds something different to the game. There are different stages with their own goals to reach. Sometimes it is required to use one of the weapon against the boss hacker, or hack something that can lead to a certain area. There is a special boss hacker in each stage that makes you work in a different way, and with an entirely different style. Some sub-levels will require stealth, while some require hacking a lock to open

of Fate By Mrs Everett CHAPTER IX The night after their restoration to the house was quiet and no more cheerful. Jonah continued to feel ill and Ned had not yet given in to the habit of sleep though the father and son did not leave their own room till after breakfast the next morning. But one comfort was gained by evening. Eli's occasional appearance about the house and gradual advance to a position of more or less importance may have alarmed the mother and Hannah, but no worse thing had happened than a disturbed mouse in the drafty cellar or the scaring away of a pair of house sparrows nesting in the thatch. The sick boy's condition tended to make each pair of parent and son agree upon the same opinion. About midday Hannah, now become wife of the father, heard their voices and presently came in to say that she had seen little Ellie at the kitchen door, and though she did not know whether the child had come in by herself or brought in some information, her first question certainly was the one anticipated. "Well, Hannah, are you quite sure—sure sure sure—that your boy has somehow out?" "Out! What do you mean, girl?" "Oh, 'tis in the wood again, your bairn. Some of the others said last night that I'd best come tell ye. I durstn't tell them ye'd be cross with me but I came and I did just what I was going to have done last night to ye, only I told him I had to go out this morning and, and I went and did all I did. There's the child is, safe and sound! He's told them you'll be glad to see him. God bless ye, I am, Hannah, I can not say too much that's more than I've said already." "Then he was out last night?" "I couldn't say. I didn't hear of it till one of the other children said, 'Oh, I forgot, he told me yesterday to go back in the wood and tell Hannah he was there.' You'll be well pleased, Hannah, to see he's told ye in time." "Yes, yes," said the father. ↵
