Most current methods of investigation of structure and function of biomacromolecules rely on the immobilization of these macromolecules. Here, DNA (dA-T-dT-dA) was covalently bound to a gold substrate via a thiol-gold bond and imaged by scanning tunneling microscopy (STM). The reversible association of a 1,5-benzodiazepine or a 1,3,5-triazine to the DNA was observed by the differential enhancement of the STM image of the immobilized DNA. The results demonstrate that nonplanar ligands with a pi-orbital overlap are capable of interacting with DNA and indicating a phase selectivity. The binding of the ligands to the immobilized DNA was easily imaged and quantitated by STM. The results presented here demonstrate that STM can be a useful technique for the detection of selective binding of functional groups to immobilized biomolecules, such as DNA, both in solution and on a solid substrate. mesenteroides NRRL-3565 to produce hydrogen peroxide and high cell density fermentation using kombucha as a substrate.

Kombucha is a traditional fermented food beverage with various health-promoting substances including hydrogen peroxide. In this work, hydrogen peroxide was produced by Leuconostoc mesenteroides NRRL-3565 from kombucha using a continuous stirred tank reactor (CSTR). After optimization of various parameters affecting fermentation process, an achieved H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> production rate of 15.9 g/L-hr, which is the
