's team as to the specifics of that piece of paper. DR: You are a great observer. If someone had ever said to you that nearly all of human history was about making war, how would you have responded? What would you have focused on? BF: Well, I would have said, "Hey, wait a minute. Look, I've lived all my life on earth, and what I see around me, including people like you, is that the vast majority of it is learning and working and playing. We have intelligence and we have art and we have culture and we have civilization. That's who we are. Nowhere is there evidence that human beings have been about war. We are about cooperation. The closest thing to a war we have is called competition, and that's only because we imagine there's a winner and a loser in every one of us. We imagine we make war by killing each other off."

DR: You've spent some time studying the history of literacy, in the Roman empire and elsewhere. What is your take on the difference between that and the history of printing? BF: Well, look, printing is a disruptive technology, because for a long time, written words were the primary and the only medium for human expression. The oldest book ever found is a clay tablet, it's 2,600 years old, and it's a lexicon. It's a dictionary. It's a catalog of words. This thing went on to become the Bible. It's not a particularly good textbook, but it's the first book that really is in the sense of being one piece. That meant that it was almost always owned and read by the same people, in the same geographical space. It was a tangible item, it was portable, and as books and manuscripts became more portable, it was copied more rapidly.

The history of printing is much more anarchic. It's a much more competitive market. In a sense, it reduces the supply of writing and publishing, because it reduces the number of people who could write and could publish. The more you can find talent and skill, the more supply there will be. So it creates opportunities for smaller groups of people to compete for a smaller supply of things. In many cases, it creates a faster rate of change. Because of the anonymous and disparate nature of printing, it allows people to write faster than they have ever written, but it also allows people to change their minds more quickly. It allows them to
