On the 29th of December, the MIT's Media Lab and the Swiss newspaper Le Temps announced a collaboration, called Lab at Le Temps, an online educational initiative, which will provide learning materials and tools to improve and advance formal and informal education. The consortium brings together researchers, students and teachers from both institutions, and aims to develop a mobile application for schools, testing grounds, and universities around the world. The first projects that will be developed for the initiative are the "Digital Student" and "School Editor". The Digital Student will be a mobile application for students, teaching them how to use the Internet. It will also include a calculator and concept/conceptual game for learning, to develop the students' logic thinking and analytical skills. The second project, "School Editor" will be aimed at students. It will enable them to create their own learning environment, based on their interests and strengths. In the long run, these learning environments will include forums, group projects, videos and other learning environments. After this, the two groups, working together, will develop a mobile application that will give its users "classrooms", "teaching objects" and "forums" in which they can share their work, and collaborate. "Adopting what I have learned from the world of education, I don't think it's right to tell a student to buy a great textbook or other materials", said Mark Weiser, lead researcher of the initiative, "Instead I propose a system in which students can create their own curricula from the printed pages of textbooks." For this, the Swiss team is collaborating with the MIT Media Lab group "The Mesh", which has previously done valuable work on the same topic. "When the co-location of Le Temps and the Media Lab was announced, we asked ourselves if it would be possible to collaborate on a new educational concept. Two weeks ago, we started working on it, with the goal of developing a project that would have a positive effect on informal and formal education", said Fabrice Arfi, director of the Media Lab. The first round of the projects funded by Lab at Le Temps will be completed by the
