That will result in unpredictable parts in your query. Now that we've established that most of the information in the table is not relevant, we need to remove it. The last piece of information we need is the key, the unique identifier for a customer to any given product. With that, we should have something that looks more like this: select distinct t.product id, a.name, b.unit price, b.cost from sales a join products b on a.product id = b.product id join products p on p.product id = a.product id and p.product id = '0983' That will give us the summary information for all sales for products with the ID of 0983. If you're still confused at this point, check out this page on explaining SQL by hand. There's no point to storing product information in the sales table because it's already in the products table; it would require three joins to get it out of the sales table. Instead, we'll just move the product information (name, unit price, and cost) into a table called sales products, which looks like this:
