A computer system may include an input device such as a mouse, trackball, a touchpad, a pen, a keyboard, or a remote control device. The interface device may be used to position an input pointer, which may be displayed on a display screen of a computing device as an icon, button, menu, selection, or other graphics. The interface device may be a wireless device that is tethered to the system by a cable and may be moved physically in order to control the position of the pointer on the display screen. The interface device may be arranged to generate a stream of data that may include motion and position information that the system may use in order to move the pointer in a computer system. There may be situations in which a person uses two or more interface devices at the same time to communicate with the system and the task to be performed by the system is complicated and/or time-consuming. For example, a first interface device may be used to control the movement of a mouse pointer in an application program on a computing device. A second interface device may be used to control the movement of a mouse pointer in another application program on the same or an associated computing device. The first interface device may be a wireless device that is tethered to the computing device by a cable and may be moved physically in order to control the position of the pointer. The second interface device may be a wireless device that is tethered to the computing device by a cable and may be moved physically in order to control the position of the pointer.
