song "That's How IQ: Is the at keyword required? I have a method, which in a code review has been commented as: This use of the at keyword is not required, here is one way of writing this code. The specific at keyword used is: at (yCoord + xCoord *

Constants.width) Has the `at` keyword been removed from the standard? What would be a recommended alternative?

A: The C++20 standard recently added a new keyword `value-bound` to the position, in the sense that an object of type `at` is always `value-bound`. The C++20 `std::vector::at` member function is defined like `T& at(index_type index) & { return const_cast(v[index]); }` There is an implementation-defined order of the underlying array elements, it is possible that `v.at(index)` could be out-of-bounds. The `at()` keyword was removed from the 2014 standard as an extension (see 18.6.1.1 paragraph 2). Prior to C++14, there is nothing that guarantees the position of the underlying array elements. A sequence point (which is ISO/IEC 14882:2011 §18.5/3 (last sentence)) prevents reordering of evaluation of the body of a value-bound, non-class braced-init-list, but the sequence point does not guarantee that the underlying array is evaluated in any order. I imagine that the code reviewer could not ensure that a certain position would be evaluated first. As a recommendation, use a function for finding the position of the desired element and use a function for the element retrieval in combination with std::advance(T& find(yCoord, xCoord, v.begin(), v.end()), yCoord + xCoord *

Constants.width); Function find checks if the yCoord + xCoord * Constants.width is valid. It might be necessary to make the search boundaries inclusive, e.g. by adding 1 to yCoord. In that case, modify the following line, e.g. 6d1f23a050
