(RF) version of the SRS Audio Essentials Home The SRS Audio Essentials® Home.Q: Protect mysql tables from user modification I am currently working on a project that will be used for testing purposes only. The project involves a website that consists of 2 major sections Admin section Private section. The Admin section allows the user to enter rows into the tables. I need to ensure that the user cannot modify the data in the tables. I have asked questions like this before, but it has all been answered with locks. I know that the way to do this is to use a unique key, for example, username as the first column. The project is MySQL based and the website is a WordPress based site. The website is hosted on a Linux server. In this case, how do I protect the tables from editing. Thanks A: Tables should be read only. A user should not be able to write to a table. How you handle the admin section should depend on your application needs. In wordpress, in order to secure your admin section you would have to tell the user the admin username and password. Then when you user log into your WP site you compare the data with your data-base to ensure the user is allowed to be there. For non-wordpress applications you might use similar techniques to restrict access to the admin section. And as @RobertGessler said, you might want to look into ldap which can be used
