However, I am moving some code to multithreading and am running into issues. The problem is that I have a function that I want to write in unmanaged code. That function uses some functions and structs defined in C++, and have the result returned to C#. Calling that function from a single thread is okay, as it's all managed code. However, when I move that same code to multiple threads the structure and functions no longer work. Here's an example of the code I run in a single thread, which works:

[DllImport("Indexer.dll")] public static extern void Indexer(string[] files, int start, int end, int[][] matrix, int progress); private const int progressIterations = 50; private const int

chunks = 100; private const int threshold = 10; private int index = 0; private void index_ProgressChanged(object sender, ProgressChangedEventArgs e) { index++; if (index == progressIterations) { index = 0;
    processProgress(e); } index = index %
    chunks; 6d1f23a050
