Miniature cameras are oftentimes used to capture images of hard to reach or difficult to view areas. One area that is particularly difficult to reach or view is the interior of the eye. To capture an image of the interior of the eye a very high resolution camera is required. Unfortunately, such a high resolution camera is relatively bulky and cumbersome. Therefore, such a high resolution camera is typically not portable, and therefore cannot be taken to a location to capture a particular image that may occur to a patient. U.S. Pat. No. 6,058,186 describes a miniature camera assembly for use in a human eye. The assembly includes a reflector having a surface having a predetermined reflective zone with a reflective surface and a peripheral zone. In one embodiment, the peripheral zone is not specular in that at least one of the reflective surface and the peripheral zone is curved or is profiled. U.S. Pat. No. 6,777,627 describes a miniature camera assembly for use in the human eye that includes a miniature camera mount that is adapted to be secured to 6d1f23a050
