Biosensors are analytical devices for the detection, quantification and identification of analytes, such as nucleic acids, proteins, chemicals and micro-organisms, in liquid samples. In recent years, biosensors have been rapidly developed due to their high specificity, selectivity and sensitivity, as well as the convenience of on-site monitoring. The development of biosensors has been based on the combination of genetic engineering technology with semiconductor fabrication. Localized microorganisms provide a novel and intriguing strategy for the construction of biosensors due to the fact that they are capable of producing metabolites, such as hydrogen peroxide, ethanol or acetate, which can be detected in the liquid sample on a chip surface. It has been shown that the accumulation of these metabolites can be followed by using microfluidics-based analytical techniques, such as high-throughput microfluidic plate readers or waveguide
