Hepatic disease and polycystic ovarian syndrome: risk of poor pregnancy outcome. Polycystic ovarian syndrome (PCOS) is a common disorder affecting approximately 6% to 12% of reproductive-aged women. Increased luteinizing hormone levels, hyperandrogenism, and insulin resistance are the underlying features of the syndrome. Depending on the degree of hyperandrogenism, any of the menstrual disturbances ranging from oligomenorrhea to menorrhagia may be associated. Although the hormonal changes associated with PCOS may promote abnormalities of the placenta, the potential long-term effects on the fetus are unknown. The objective of this study was to review the effect of PCOS on pregnancy outcome. A search of MEDLINE and PUBMED, using key words "polycystic ovarian syndrome" and "pregnancy," identified 40 articles for possible inclusion, of which only nine studies met the inclusion criteria and were reviewed. Publications presenting information on pregnancy outcome in patients with PCOS included case reports, small case series, and larger retrospective case-control studies. The overall reported prevalence of poor pregnancy outcomes in women with PCOS appears to be relatively uncommon and was between 0% and 2% in most studies. A causal relationship between PCOS and poor pregnancy outcome is tenuous and requires further evaluation.

Q: Why do I need to pass my $scope? I am using AngularJS on an inherited project. To my knowledge it is not my own and I am only looking to make improvements. I have come across several places where there is an object $scope. I've had a look around and can't see any reason why one would need to pass this around as a paramater. Maybe I'm missing something obvious - I

JPMorgan's Smith is back with a long-overdue look at the markets in 2017. He finds it "fundamental" that the market never gave up on an economic rebound. He does believe Trump will deliver some stimulus, although probably not until 2018. JPMorgan's chief U.S. economist tells Business Insider that President Donald Trump will deliver more fiscal stimulus than market observers have figured. "Even though the market has taken some positions, we don't see it as 'Trump is a risk' — we think [Trump] can deliver more," JPMorgan's Nick Kalivas said. Trump has floated the idea of another infrastructure bill, which could happen even before he's fully settled into the White House. The president-elect also offered various suggestions for tax reform on the campaign trail and he has also floated some ideas on how he plans to revamp the farm system. The main difference now is that there is one of the primary political parties in Congress that is a real supporter of Trump's agenda. While Democrats have been focused on pushing a message of "inequality," they could be forced to compromise more with Trump and Republicans on deficit reduction and tax reform. "I would think that the market would be willing to go to the lower for lower deficit numbers," Kalivas told Business Insider. "I think the market would be willing to go down and get there faster than we think now." While Trump has said he plans to overhaul the tax code and deficit reduction, he's also been hesitant to come out too far and fast with a plan of his own. As Business

Insider's Tim Culpan has pointed out, the market is weighing the shift in Republican policy against a president that is even less predictable than the party that currently holds Congress. "Even though we think he will deliver, we're not sure of the timing of that," Kalivas said. "We'll know more about that as time progresses." 6d1f23a050
