Conventional technologies for performing session management have focused on the question, "What data should be stored in order to perform a session management session?" For instance, assume that a user logs on to a web site using a web browser. In conventional systems, if the web browser is used to perform a session management operation, then the data that should be stored in order to perform session management includes information about the user's login to the site. In this scenario, the application developer has no way of knowing whether the user who is logged on is accessing the site for the first time, or whether the user is simply revisiting the site. In addition to the question of whether data that should be stored to perform session management exists, the question of which data is needed is not answered. For instance, assume that a user is logged on to a web site using a web browser.

Assume that the user is having trouble accessing a specific web page. The web browser may simply open a new window and display the web page. Alternatively, if the web browser is used to perform session management, then the data that should be stored in order to perform session management includes information about the web page that was attempted to be accessed by the user, that is, the data that would be needed to access the specific web page in order to display it. For instance, if the web page to be c6a93da74d
