catheterization has been the conventional method of diagnosing MVP. However, since the defect is usually small, rarely one causes hemodynamic changes of a great enough magnitude to be clinically significant, a sensitive noninvasive method of diagnosing the disorder would be of great value. Among the proposed methods of diagnosing MVP are echocardiography, endomyocardial biopsy, transesophageal echocardiography and cardiac catheterization.

This study proposes to compare the sensitivity and specificity of these methods by determining which is more accurate in detecting MVP in a population of 40 healthy patients who are either patients or family members of patients with known or suspected MVP.

The accuracy of the diagnosis will be compared with the known extent of MVP on cineangiograms. MVP will be confirmed by surgery and histological examination. Cardiac catheterization will be performed in order to compare selected hemodynamic parameters of patient and control groups. The study population will consist of both patients and their
