in the treatment of cystic fibrosis. To review the recent literature and determine how current understanding of cystic fibrosis (CF) has changed since the publication of the initial guidelines. A MEDLINE search for the years 1992 to 1999 was performed to locate articles concerning the treatment of patients with CF, as well as available knowledge relevant to CF. The knowledge base has been reconceptualized with respect to understanding specific areas of CF research, including airway obstruction, lung function, infection, basic science and basic cell biology, nutritional therapy, and recent developments in gene transfer, pharmacokinetics, and biomarkers. The acquisition of respiratory physiologic data has been transformed since the publication of the original guidelines by improved understanding of how the underlying chronic CF lung disease affects both the conductive and the respiratory systems. Parenteral nutrition, per os airways clearance therapy, and subcutaneous erythropoietin have also been shown to produce significant clinical improvements. Major advances have been made in understanding CF lung disease. Major advances in therapy have not yet been made. Research efforts should continue, focusing on therapies that can slow the rate of decline in lung function and lengthen the median survival of patients. The understanding of basic cell and molecular biology has allowed us to conceive of promising future therapies, including gene therapy, gene transfer c6a93da74d
