suspended material, from proteinaceous food material such as skim milk, cream, casein, whey and other food products of this type, such as the by-products of the cheese manufacturing process. much attention has been paid in recent years to controlling or eliminating conditions in the factory and in the process for manufacturing food products, such as milk products, which are detrimental to the health and safety of the workers and others consuming the product and which may adversely affect the quality of the product. in this regard, attention has been given to the prevention of potentially dangerous bacteria buildup in factories and the cleaning and reconditioning of equipment to reduce the likelihood that diseases such as tuberculosis will be transmitted to and from such factories. at the same time, however, safety of the product has become an important consideration, and the food industry has been struggling to find economical ways to assure the highest possible safety of the

calcium, minerals, and other materials, to be deposited on the filter medium of the manufacturing apparatus. such an accumulation of material on the filter medium is more likely to occur as the operating temperature is raised. for instance, silica is reported to be a major contributor to the formation of deposits on milk filters. 5ec8ef588b
