you could do this: first, you would have to open a clip in the editor, select everything, then click on "enter menu" to get the menu that allows you to select an audio track and subtitle, as well as a template. once you have all the editable fields filled in, hit f2 to "save as" and save the result to a new filename with another .srt extension. it will also retain the.srt in the clip name, as long as you've done the data entry required above. make sure you've "encoded" the file and you're done. if you don't save it, just reopen the clip in the editor and you will then be able to enter all the editable fields by double clicking in the table. you can do any of the things that were suggested - right-click "edit" on the file, then "add to list", or open the file in the editor and right-click and choose "enter menu" and use the template options and settings to edit. if i edit a file i made, the next time i open it, it will still be open so !I'll need to close it before i can edit it again. (i've gotten used to that as it's a pretty simple program, but they could make it more user-friendly.) the stock "convertxtodvd.exe" created by convertx to dvd (one of the first options) or the stock "convertxtodvd.exe" created by code dvd builder 5 (one of the first tools reviewed on this site), will not make a dvd at all. they are simply an automated way to record the audio to file and make the dvd menu. it will then convert the video through a process that strips away any of the other tracks. it is more about recording audio than anything else. just make sure that when you press the "ok" button you watch the option "use template to create dvd menu". otherwise you end up with a dvd that has an incomplete menu. (it is very easy to see how there are many options that are not available in the template to be used for creating a dvd menu. i just took a pic of the dvd menu builder window of the program.
