I have a pretty simple TableModel, and simple JTable. I'm using a MouseAdapter to add a MouseMotionListener to the JTable. What I want to do is when I drag a cell with the mouse, that row should move up or down (depending on the way I move) the column to the left of it. Am I barking up the wrong tree? I don't think the MouseAdapter can perform such calculations. I only want to highlight the rows that I've been clicking. Also, if possible, how can I have the rows'stretch' smoothly when I drag the row to the left of it (just like when you click on the row and the row 'glides' to the left of it)? A: You should look into Java Naming Conventions, such as how to keep class names to a single line. Then, you should be using java.util.List.remove(E e) method. I have gone from something like this: Row r = ((DefaultTableModel)table.getModel()).getRow(x); String s = r.getValueAt(x, 2); to List rows = ((MyTableModel)table.getModel()).getRows(); rows.remove(x); // Do something with the new rows You can also look at the DefaultTableModel. Q: Click once installation and publishing from same project? I'm new to ClickOnce so please forgive my ignorance. I've developed an application using Visual Studio 2010,.NET Framework 4.0 and have published it as ClickOnce. If I make changes to the source code, how do I tell it to publish the updated version, rather than the application that is currently being run? I can't find a way of selecting what application to publish. A: If you made any changes, the installation would have already set a default version of the application to install. To update the application, you would simply right-click on the installed application, and select Publish.
